Intercultural education is the great challenge of 21st-century society. This book is designed in a way that the theory and practice of intercultural education are closely linked, so allowing reader to not only reflect upon the subject, but also, more importantly, to act. It discusses various consequences of immigration related to citizens' rights, racism and its different manifestations, and contends that intercultural education constitutes an fundamental means of developing democratic values. Finally, it offers a short analysis of the concept of mediation and its variants, the figure of the mediator and the circumstances which have necessitated the rise of intercultural mediation: what this means and its connection to the education system.
